

SOCI201N : Contemporary Social Problems

In this course, students will critically examine a selection of the most pressing issues and problems facing society today, including inequalities of wealth and income, crime and violence, race relations, gender and sexuality, work and the economy, globalization, technology, and the environment. To accomplish this objective, students will learn to apply the sociological perspective to the study of contemporary social life. Through this examination, students will gain an understanding of how social problems arise and how they affect society, and they will apply this understanding to the consideration of possible social policies and other remedies. The course takes a hands-on approach to learning wherever applicable. The goals of this course are to provide a solid foundation in social science learning, to enhance critical thinking skills, and to stimulate social commitment.

Class Hours 3

Lab Hours 0

Credits 3

Prerequisites

ENGL101N or ENGL110N.